

their own rule ; the etymologist was often forced to spell with the people ; and the advocate for the authority of pronunciation, found it sometimes deviating so capriciously from the received use of writing, that he was constrained to comply with the rule of his adversaries, lest he should loose the end by the means, and be left alone by following the croud.

WHEN a question of orthography is dubious, that practice has, in my opinion, a claim to preference, which preserves the greatest number of radical letters, or seems most to comply with the general custom of our language. But the chief rule which I propose to follow, is to make no innovation, without a reason sufficient to balance the inconvenience of change ; and such reasons I do not expect often to find. All change is of itself an evil, which ought not to be hazarded but for evident advantage ; and as inconstancy is in every case a mark of weakness, it will add nothing to the reputation of our tongue. There are, indeed, some who despise the inconveniencies of confusion, who seem to take pleasure in departing from custom, and to think alteration desirable for its own sake, and the reformation of our orthography, which these writers have attempted, should not pass without its due honours, but that I suppose they hold singularity its own reward, or may dread the fascination of lavish praise.

THE

THE present usage of spelling, where the present can be distinguished, will therefore in this work be generally followed, yet there will be often occasion to show that it is in itself inaccurate, and tolerated rather than chosen ; particularly, when by a change of one or more, the meaning of a word is obscured. farrier, for ferrier, as it was formerly written ; ferrum or fer ; in gibberish for gebrish, the word of Geber and his chymical followers, understood none but their own tribe. It will be likewise proper to trace back the orthography of different words, and shew by what gradations the word departed from its original.

CLOSELY connected with orthography is pronunciation, the stability of which is of great importance to the duration of a language, because the first step will naturally begin by corruptions in the living language. The want of certain rules for the pronunciation of former ages, has made us wholly ignorant of the technical art of our ancient poets ; and since they study their sentiments regret the loss of their pronunciation, it is surely time to provide that the harmony of moderns may be more permanent.

A NEW pronunciation will make almost no change in speech, and therefore since one great end of the undertaking is to fix the English language, care will
